The Daily Standard.

Thursday, August 11, 1870. A Glimpse of English Politics.

If the doings of the greatest political assembly in the world-The Imperial Parliament-are eagerly watched by foreign nations, they are surely worth some attention from us who repose under its shadow and claim a share in its glories. The statesmen who now guide the destinies of the Empire on which the sun never sets are gradually relinquishing, under the pressure of public opinion. The meddlesome foreign policy which in former times resulted in so much glory and so much misery. They have discovered that even military glory may be purchased too dearly, and that it does not pay to interfere in all their neigh bors quarrels. Even the brilliant victory of Waterloo is thought by many to have produced no other good result than to fertilise the field on which it was won.

"How that red rain bath made the Harvest Grow!
And is this all the World has gained by thee,
Thou first and last of fields, King making Victory?"

The popular power is now strong enough to dictate the national policy, guided by "the wisdom of a thousand years," and by enlightened and patriotic leaders, the nation has ceased to constitute itself the policeman of the world, and begun to devote its energies to the consolidation of its scattered elements. the development of its splendid resources and the removal of internal abuses and imperfections. The constitutional machinery by which such beneficent changes have been and are being effected, is party government, or political competition. The party in power, whether nominally liberal or conservative, -and generally there is a good deal of conservatism in the Liberal ranks and Liberalism in the conservative. finds itself face to face with an opposition of nearly equal strength, watching with lynx-eye and criticising with unsparing severity all its measures, and ready to supplant it the moment public opinion turns the scales of power. The great measure of parliamentary reform which was passed three years ago puts the franchise within the reach of almost every man of intelligence and settled industry In boroughs, every man, being a resident householder, or in certain cases even a mere lodger, and in counties every man occupying premises of the rateable value of £12 ($60) per annum, is entitled to a vote. The 40s. freehold and other existing qualifications are retained. This measure, which increased the power of the people to an enormous exteut, was the production of Mr. Disraeli, the Conservative leader, and elevated him, on the retirement of Lord Derby, to the highest pinnacle of power. He did not, however, succeed in retaining the premiership more than a few mouths. The general election which took place in the Autumn of 1868, placed him in an unmistkeable minority, and, without waiting for the adverse vote which he could not hope to avoid, he at once resigned in favor of his more popular rival, Mr. Glad-stone. Mr. Gladstone, having been enthusiastically recognised as leader by the Liberals of every shade, succeeded in forming the strongest ministry that has been seen in modern times. Mr. Bright, the eloquent champion of pure democracy, and Mr. Lowe, its bitter opponent, forgot their mutual animosities and fierce denunciations, and though having been recently foes of Mr. Glad stone as well as of each other, quietly entered his Cabinet together, and have since worked in harmony for the common good of the nation, the former at the Board of Trade, the latter as Chancellor of the Exchequer. The aristocratic element is as strongly represented as the democratic in the Cabinet, and includes such noble names as Earl Granvslle and the Duke of Argyll. The Irish policy of the Government we briefly reviewed a day or two ago. In other matters the leading features of its policy are peace and retrenchment, and there can be little doubt, notwithstanding occasional telegraphic reports to the contrary, that it will endeavor to the utmost to steer the State vessel clear of the continental war now raging. Whether its colonial policy is vigorous and enlightened enough to meet the exigencies of the times-a matter of vital importance to British Columbians-is not quite so clear; but of that we shall speak more at length on a future occasion.

GERMAN IMMIGRANTS .- The vicinity of Esquimalt, after the arrival of the Idaho from San Francisco on Tuesday, presented a scene which has not been witnessed since the busy times of 1862. The German immigrants landed and pitched their tents and commenced cooking their vituals and washing their clothes. They are all married and have families. About 300 more are in San Francisco awaiting the return of the Idaho to bring them to their new homes on Puget

The steamer Otter arrived in Esquimal, harbor yesterday morning from Nanaimo. with a full cargo of coal and a few passedgers, among whom were Messrs. Fraser and Davies, and six other miners, who came all the way from the Forks of Skeena river, via Fort Simpson, in a canoe. From them we learn the following : The party left Vital ereek, Omineca, on the 21st of June, arrived at Acquilgette, the Forks of Skeens river, about the 1st of July, where they found Johnny Mitchell and two other men named Helt and Moss, who had been prospecting there, but had not found anything to pay. About three months ago 'wo of Mitchell's party named Donovan and Madden, started out on a prospecting expedition in the neighporhood of Bear Lake. They took two Indians as far as Babine river with them to pack their provisions | The, then sent them ack: and these Indians reported to Mitchell that the Kisugach Indians were not friendly with the white men. About a month after the party had been gone, two more Indians arrived at Mitchell's camp, and reported that they had seen the tent of Madde and his compa ion, wi h the pro-risions and everything uside of t, but the men were gone. Upon examining the Indian carefully, Mitchell r cognized a pair f ponts on him whi h looked like the pant wern y Madden hen he went away.
